The Astrologer, the Maid, and the Monkey.

OF all the cheats, excepting one,
That e'er were hatch'd below the Sun,
A man might swear, if that were modest,
That Fortune-telling is the oddest.
They term themselves the Sons of Art,
And others call the vulgar part;
While they themselves (the truth to tell)
Could never read a Psalter well.

The faithful American Dog.

AN Officer in the late American army, on his station at the westward, went out in the morning with his Dog and gun, in quest of game. Venturing too far from the garrison, he was fired upon by an Indian, who was lurking in the bushes, and instantly fell to the ground.

The Indian, running to him, struck him on the head with his tomahawk, in order to dispatch him; but, the button of his hat fortunately warding off the edge, he was only stunned by the blow. With savage cruelty he applied the scalping-knife, and hastened away with this horrid trophy of his victory; leaving the Officer for dead, and none to relieve or console him, but his faithful Dog.

The afflicted creature gave every expression of his attachment, fidelity, and affection. He licked the wounds with inexpressible tenderness, and mourned the fate of his beloved Master. Having performed every office which sympathy dictated, or sagacity could invent, without being able to remove his Master from the fatal spot, or procure from him any signs of life, or his wonted expressions of affection to him; he ran off in quest of help.

Bending his course towards the river, where two men were fishing, he urged them, by all the powers of native rhetoric, to accompany him to the woods. The men were suspicious of a decoy to an ambuscade, and dared not venture to follow the Dog; who, finding all his caresses fail, returned to the care of his Master; and, licking his wounds a second time, renewed all his tenderness; but with no better success than before.

Again he returned to the men; once more to try his skill in alluring them to his assistance. In this attempt he was more successful, than in the other. The men, seeing his solicitude, began to think the Dog might have discovered some valuable game, and determined to hazard the consequences of following him.

Transported with his success, the affectionate creature hurried them along, by every expression of ardor. Presently they arrived at the spot; where they beheld—an Officer wounded, scalped, weltering in his own gore, and faint with the loss of blood.

Suffice it to say, he was yet alive. They carried him to the fort, where the first dressings were performed. A suppu-

Of one of these, above the rest,
 I somewhere read the following jest.
 Of this great Art he was the wonder!
 Could tell what Planet folks were under,
 And, by his figure-casting skill,
 Point out their fortune, good or ill.
 He on a time, because he would Get near the Stars as e'er he could,
 Assumes the Garret, by gradation,
 There sits profound in contemplation.

ration immediately took place, and he was soon conveyed to the hospital at Albany; where, in a few weeks, he entirely recovered, and was able to return to his duty.

This worthy Officer owed his life, probably, to the fidelity of this sagacious Dog. His tongue, which the Gentleman afterwards declared gave him the most exquisite pleasure, clarified the wound in the most effectual manner; and his perseverance brought that assistance, without which his Master must soon have perished.

“ My Dog, the truest of his kind,
With gratitude inflames my mind:
I mark his true, his faithful way,
And, in my service, copy Tray.”

The Hottentot and the Lion.

AN elderly Hottentot, in the service of a Christian, near the upper part of Sunday river, on the Cambdebo side, perceived a Lion following him, at a great distance, for two hours together. Thence he naturally concluded, that the Lion only waited for the approach of darkness, in order to make him a prey; and, in the mean time, could not expect any other than to serve for this fierce animal's supper; inasmuch as he had no weapon of defence but a stick, and knew that he could not get home before dark.

But, as he was well acquainted with the nature of the Lion, and the manner of his seizing upon his prey; and had leisure to ruminate on the best means of preserving himself; he at length hit on a method of saving his life.

For this purpose, instead of making the best of his way home, he sought out a precipice; and, setting down on the edge of it, found, to his great joy, that the Lion also halted, and kept his former distance.

As soon as it grew dark, the Hottentot, sliding a little forward, let himself down below the upper edge of the precipice, upon some projecting part or cleft of the rock, where he could just keep himself from falling. But, in order to cheat the Lion more effectually, he set his hat and cloak on the stick, making with it a gentle motion just over his head, a little way from the edge of the precipice.

This crafty expedient had the desired success. He did not stay long in that situation, before the Lion came creeping softly towards him, like a cat; and, mistaking the skin-coat

And still his mind to mischief gives,
Taking, unseen, a silver spoon,
Runs to the house-top with his boon:
At length it tumbles down the shingles,
The Student hears it as it gingles;
And, from the window, he perceives
It in the gutter, at the eves:

for the Hottentot himself, took his leap with such exactness and precision, as to fall headlong down the precipice, and was dashed in pieces.

Worth superior to Birth, High-blood, or Title.

THE pomp of honours may by Kings be giv'n,
To men, all equally the make of Heav'n:
But true nobility's confin'd to none;
It gilds the cottage, and may leave the throne.
As when some river, from a mudded source,
Through cleansing sands, is filter'd in its course,
A limpid stream runs o'er the flow'ry plain,
Till, chok'd, it stagnates into filth again;
So flow the tides of ancestry through man;
Some doom'd to finish as they first began;
Whilst others triumph in the waste of time,
Without the foul obstruction of a crime.
Can all the tinsel equipage of pride,
Enoble meanness—or that meanness hide?
Can vice delude us with a specious show,
Or lift a wretch intrinsically low?
True virtue triumphs on the barren rock,
And braves calamity's severest shock:
Vice, in the midst of luxury and ease,
Is inly tortur'd by the mind's disease.

The Sailor and the Monkeys.

PERHAPS no animal, below the human species, resembles man more in the imitative faculty, than the Monkey. It is said that a Sailor, having a number of red woollen caps to dispose of, went on shore, in South America, to trade with the natives.

In his way to a settlement, lying through a wood very thickly inhabited by Monkeys, it being in the heat of the day, he put a cap on his head, and, laying the others by his side, determined to take a little repose under the shade of a large tree.

To his utter astonishment, when he awoke, from the specimen he had given his imitative observers of the use of his caps, he beheld a number of them upon the heads of the Monkeys, in the trees round about him; while the wearers were chattering in the most unusual manner.

Finding every attempt to regain his caps fruitless, he at length, in a fit of rage and disappointment, and under the supposition that the one on his head was not worth taking away, pulled it off; and, throwing it upon the ground, exclaimed, "Here, you little thieving rogues, if you will keep the rest, you are welcome to this also."

He had no sooner done this, than, to his great surprise, the little observing animals very readily imitated him. They all threw down their caps upon the ground; by which the Sailor regained his property, and marched off in triumph. Happy would it be for mankind, if they resembled Monkeys, in imitating only the virtues of those whom they considered their superiors; while they avoided their vices.

M E D I O C R I T Y.

PLACE me, ye powers, in some obscure retreat;

O keep me innocent! make others great!

In quiet shades, content with rural sports,

Give me a life remote from guilty courts;

Where, free from hopes and fears, in humble ease,

Unheard of, I may live and die in peace!

Happy the man who, thus retir'd from sight,

Studies himself, and seeks no other light:

But most unhappy he who, plac'd on high,

Expos'd to ev'ry tongue and ev'ry eye;

Whose follies, blaz'd about, to all are known,

And are a secret to himself alone;

Worse is an evil name, much worse than none. }

Young Rakes outwitted by an old One.

AN aged Man, travelling on business, put up at a tavern. Having rode all day in a storm, he requested his Landlord to give him a room, fire, and some refreshment, which was immediately done.

Soon after, sixteen young Fellows came in, who demanded of the Landlord the best room in the house. He said it was engaged, and he was unwilling to disoblige the Guest. They then requested leave to speak with him; and proposed to hire him to quit the room. Leave was given, and proposals made and rejected: But the old Man had the complaisance to offer them permission to spend the evening with him. To this they replied, "We shall raise the Devil." "Well

(said the good Man) I will lay him for you." Upon which the treaty closed.

The young Debauchees immediately ordered sixteen bottles of wine, drank them, and broke the bottles against the chimney back. The old Man (who partook with them) called for his bottle, and broke it likewise. The young Fellows, still determined to oblige the old Man to quit his post, and leave them masters of the ground, agreed that some one of the company should make proposals, and execute them himself first; and that, if any person in the room refused to follow, he should pay five pounds; to which all agreed. The first was, to burn all their hats; the second, their coats; the third, their waistcoats; and fourth, their boots; which was accordingly executed by them; and the old Man followed suit.

After this, he said, "Gentlemen, now it is my turn to make proposals, to which I demand your compliance, under the former penalty;" to which they readily consented. The Landlord was called, and a Surgeon ordered with his instruments; when the old Man proposed, that each one of the company should have all the teeth in his head extracted. He sat himself down accordingly, and ordered the Surgeon to proceed: But, to their astonishment, the old Man had but one stump left to gratify their curiosity; which was sacrificed to execute the proposal.

The young Men soon discovered that they were out-generalled; and, rather than part with their teeth, settled a truce with the old Hero; paid him five pounds each; paid the Landlord's bill for the wine, &c.; and had only the consolation to go home naked, and tell their friends, as Paddy told General Washington; that one veteran Rake had surrounded and caught them napping.

The gallant Soldier back to his good sense!
His temp'ral field so cautious not to lose;
So careless quite of his eternal foes!

Why so profuse of a superior Name?

But—for the King of Kings' sake—do not swear!

Abou Taib. An Eastern Tale.

ABOU TAIB, Emperor of India, ascended the throne of his Fathers amidst the acclamations of his people, and blessed with all that Nature or fortune could bestow, to confer happiness. His treasures surpassed computation; and forty nations submitted implicitly to his sceptre. His seraglio was filled with the greatest beauties of the East; his table constantly furnished with a round of the most luxurious dainties; and nothing which sense can desire, or capricious fancy invent, was denied to Abou Taib.

One day as he walked in his palace, reflecting on his power, his wealth, and the various means of pleasure he possessed, a messenger arrived to inform him, that one of the principal Nobles of his court was suddenly dead. This melancholy and unexpected event entirely occupied his thoughts. "Alas! (said he) what is every thing that ambition can attain, or wealth procure! One end happeneth to all; and Death, who concludes the woes of the Beggar, shall one day terminate the power and splendor of the Emperor of Indostan. Were life eternally to endure, what I enjoy were, indeed, much to be prized: But, of what avail are riches, pleasure, or power, while the loss of them is thus certain?"

At that moment, a burst of thunder shook the palace to the foundation; and the Genius Abasson stood before the Monarch.

"Repining mortal (said the ethereal vision) I have heard thy murmurs; and, that thou mayest no longer have reason for such complaints, take this Talisman, and, at the end of any day hereafter, which thou hast spent in pleasures and delight, apply it to thy forehead, forming a wish that the next may be perfectly like it; and thou shalt find each following one exactly the same, in every event and enjoyment; nor shall they cloy by repetition: Thou shalt be new to the pleasures of each successive day, as if the preceding had never been. The day thou wilt fix on is left to thy choice; only be careful how thou usest my gift, and choose that, the delights of which thou wouldst perpetuate, with prudence: For, having once employed the Charm, thou wilt have no power to reverse it; but wilt be necessitated, continually to repeat the felicity first chosen." So saying, the Genius disappeared.

Abou Taib received the Talisman with inexpressible joy, believing that an immortality of pleasure was now in his power; and not doubting but he should soon be able to fix on the day, of which the constant return should produce a never-ceasing round of perfect happiness.

But this was not so easy as he had at first supposed. Every evening, when he came to reflect on the circle of hours that had just fled, he constantly found something too unsatisfactory in the pleasures they had produced, for him to expect much delight from their repetition. Hope continually allured him on, to look forward to some happier moments, which might better deserve perpetuity. This felicity, however, was continually expected; but never arrived. Every successive day pleased him still less than the past.

In the mean time, age crept upon Abou Taib. Those enjoyments which he found so imperfect in the fervour of youth, appeared still less satisfactory in his declining years. Yet, strange infatuation of the forcerefs Hope! his chimerical expectation of greater happiness to come, daily increased.

At last, while fancy was amusing him with scenes of future, and forever recurring bliss, an acute disorder seized upon Abou Taib. His gaiety, his vigour, and every capacity of enjoying pleasure, fled before it; nor was it long, ere the most experienced of his Physicians pronounced, he had not six hours to live. Shocked at the hasty approach of the angel of Death, and resolved to avail himself of his Talisman, he applied the gift of the Genius, from which he had promised himself never-ending pleasure, to perpetuate extreme and eternal anguish!

His misery soon made him desirous to invite that Death he had been so solicitous to shun; but the fatal Charm was not to be reversed. Day after day, he started from the same dreadful dreams, to suffer the same round of sickness, pain, and torture.

The Genius, at length, pitying his condition, and moved by his prayer, appeared again before him. "Man of many follies (cried he) murmur no more at the decrees of Heaven; repine not at the flight of pleasures you have not thought worth repeating! Wherefore should you blame the shortness of a life, in which you have been so unwilling to protract, even your highest enjoyments? Whatever applies to every part, must apply to the whole; and what is true of every day of our lives, must be true of life in general. What, then, in praying for its continuance, do you wish to be continued? The flattering dreams of imagination, and the fallacious promises of Hope, never completely fulfilled; but repeatedly, nay, almost always utterly falsified! Let those who hear your story learn, by your example, to remain contented with the condition Providence has allotted them; and remember, that even the end of their imperfect happiness, is to be considered as an addition to the little felicity they enjoy."

The Genius ended; and the Angel of death, to him the Angel of bliss, closed the eyes of Abou Taib.

On the Sabbath.

THIS day the Deity to man has giv'n,
By just degrees to plume his soul for Heav'n,
And publicly to join in grateful praise,
For all the blessings of their other days:
This small return he surely may expect,
And will as surely punish its neglect.
On this, his day, necessity alone,
For absence from the Temple can atone.

Curious Adventure of a Hessian, during the late War.

WHEN Gen. Washington captured the Hessians at Trenton, in December, 1776, a private Soldier, who by flight escaped the fate of his comrades, betook himself to a neighbouring wood. Unacquainted with the country, and a stranger to the English language, he conceived it impossible for him, at that time, to escape to any of the posts occupied by the British forces; he therefore constructed a rude, temporary habitation, at the foot of a hill, sheltered from the inclemency of the weather by the surrounding forest. In this solitary abode he dwelt nine months, subsisting almost altogether on such vegetable productions as the country and seasons afforded.

At length, grown weary of his inhospitable and unfriendly lodging, he sought, and found one more agreeable in an adjacent hay-barrack. The proprietor, a Farmer near Trenton, observed the hay, at different times, disordered in such a manner as induced him to suspect, that some stranger had taken up his lodging there; and determined to know who the nocturnal intruder might be: He attended one morning with several of his domestics, and, having placed themselves in a convenient position, waited his departure. At the dawn of day he came forth, yawned, and shook himself, and then began his march, by easy steps, to his retirement in the woods. The Farmer and his attendants cracked their whips, and gave a shout, which very much accelerated his progress. They pursued, and ere he could reach his wretched asylum, was overtaken and seized.

His grotesque figure (occasioned by the tattered state of his regimentals; an old worsted stocking drawn over his head, as a substitute for a hat; his dishevelled locks, and venerable beard; together with the amazement and terror which distorted his countenance); induced his pursuers to suppose him an unfortunate Maniac: And, fearing the consequences of making too free with a person of that description, when at liberty, they very prudently bound his hands behind him, and then conducted him to their dwelling.

During these transactions, he observed an uniform silence; and, considering all around him his sanguinary foes, he surrendered himself to melancholy and deep despair.

Soon after, several neighbours came in; some of whom he discovered, by their language, to be Germans. To these he addressed himself; gave an affecting relation of his curious adventure; and sued for protection. They all assured him of their friendly dispositions towards him; and immediately offered him employment in the labours of husbandry.

He soon became perfectly reconciled to his fate; accepted their proposal; and proved, by his industry and integrity, a very valuable member of the community.

Effects of honourable Love.

A MAN of delicacy oft betrays his passion, by his too great anxiety to conceal it; especially if he has little hopes of success. True love, in all its stages, seeks concealment, and never expects success. It renders a man not only respectful, but timid, to the highest degree, in his behaviour to the woman he loves.

To conceal the awe he stands in of her, he may sometimes affect pleasantry; but it sits awkwardly on him; and he quickly relapses into seriousness, if not dullness. He magnifies all her real perfections, in his imagination; and is either blind to her failings, or converts them into beauties. Like a person conscious of guilt, he is jealous that every eye observes him; and, to avoid this, he shuns all the little observances of common gallantry.

His heart and his character will be improved, in every respect, by his attachment. His manners will become more gentle, and his conversation more agreeable; but diffidence and embarrassment will always make him appear to disadvantage, in the company of his Mistress. If the fascination continue long, it will depress his spirit, and extinguish every vigorous and manly principle of his mind.

Advice to a Friend inclining to marry.

I WOULD not have you, Strephon, choose a mate

From too exalted, or too mean a state;

In these extremes we may expect to find

A creeping Spirit, or a haughty Mind.

One in the middle region, ever shares

The least disquietudes, and fewest cares.

Let her extraction with true lustre shine;

If something brighter, not too bright for thine:

Her education liberal, not great;

Neither inferior, nor above her state.

Let her have wit; but let that wit be free

From affectation, pride, and pedantry:

For the effect of Woman's wit is such,

'Too little is as dang'rous as too much.

But, chiefly, let her humour close with thine;

Unless where yours may to a fault incline:

The least disparity in this destroys,

Like sulph'rous blasts, the very buds of joys.

Her person neat——her amiable Mind,

To Innocence and Virtue still inclin'd.

Let not her years exceed, if equal, thine;

For Women, past their vigour, soon decline.

Her fortune competent; and, if thy sight

Can reach so far, take care 'twas gather'd right.

If thine's enough, then her's may be the less:

Do not aspire to Riches in excess.

For, that which makes our Lives delightful prove,

Is Competency, blest'd with mutual Love.

On a dull Poet.

YOU beat your Pate, and fancy Wit will come:

Knock as you please, there's nobody at Home.

The four Wonders.

A GREAT Woman not imperious, a fair Woman not vain, a Woman of common talents not jealous, an accomplished Woman who scorns to shine; are four Wonders, just fit to be divided among the four quarters of the Globe.

On a scolding Wife, who died in her Sleep.

HERE lies the quintessence of noise and strife;
Or, in one Word, here lies a scolding Wife:
Had Death not took her when her Mouth was shut,
He durst not, for his Ears, have touch'd the Slut.

The Irishman and his silk Stockings.

AN Irish Gentleman, being visited by a Friend, was found a little ruffled, and, being asked the reason of it, said, he had lost a new pair of black silk stockings out of his room, which had cost him eighteen shillings; but that he hoped he should get them again; for he had ordered them to be cried, and had offered Half a Crown reward. The other observed, that the reward was too little for such valuable stockings. "Pho (said the Irishman) I ordered the Crier to say they were worsted."

The Miser and the Mouse.

AS Pedro stalk'd around his house,
The jealous Miser spy'd a Mouse.
'How now! (cry'd he) what dost thou here?'
'Sir (said the Mouse) dismiss your fear:
I came not with the Hope of Food;
But for the sake of Solitude.'

The Irishman's Pistol, which grew to a Gun.

A Countryman was indicted and arraigned for stealing a Goose; but the accusation was false; for he brought a Neighbour of his who swore, positively, that he remembered that very Goose in his possession, ever since it was a Gosling. An Irishman, who was a Prisoner for stealing a Gun, hearing this able defence, prevailed on a fellow Countryman of his to swear, that he remembered the Gun in his possession, ever since it was a Pistol.

An useful Treatment for the Dysentery, and Scarlatina Anginosa, or Canker Rash.

IN the course of an extensive practice, for about five years past, I have met with the most pleasing success, in treating the Dysentery, and Scarlatina Anginosa; and, as these complaints frequently extend their baneful ravages, I take pleasure in communicating to the Public a simple remedy, which, when judiciously used, has seldom failed of removing those diseases.

Saturate any quantity of the best Vinegar with common Marine Salt. To one large table-spoonful of this solution, add four times the quantity of boiling water. Let the Patient take of this preparation, as hot as it can be swallowed, one spoonful once in half a minute, until the whole is drank. This for an Adult. The quantity may be varied, according to the age, size, and constitution of the Patient. If necessary, repeat the Dose once in six or eight hours. Considerable evacuations, I conceive to be, not only unnecessary, but injurious, as they serve to debilitate, and prolong the disease.

A tea of Plantain, or some other cooling, simple drink, may be useful; and, if a thirst for Cider be discovered, it may be gratified.

Carefully avoid keeping this preparation in vessels partaking of the qualities of lead, as the poison produced by that mean, may prove dangerous.

The success of the remedy depends much on preparing and giving the dose, as above directed.

The simplicity of this treatment renders it the more valuable, as all persons have it in their power to avail themselves of its use.

I have found it useful in Agues, Diarrhoeas, and the Yellow Fever.

ELISHA PERKINS.

On cutting of Teeth.

IT is generally observed, that the greatest proportion of Children die under two years of age. This is chiefly owing to their cutting teeth during that period. Hence convulsions, fevers, and, in cities and towns, vomiting and purging, of which so many die every year. These fatal effects might, in many cases, be prevented, by cutting the gums with a lancet, or sharp-pointed knife, deep enough to feel the tooth.

Remedy for the Piles.

WHEN the Piles have continued a long time, and produced running fores, they may often be cured by taking from 30 to 60 drops of Balsam Capivi, or Spirits of Turpentine, morning and evening, in a little sugar and water.

Cure for the Dropsy.

DISSOLVE a table-spoonful of powdered Cream of Tartar in a quart of water. Drink this in the course of the day, and repeat it for three or four days. It will bring away a great deal of water, by stool, with little or no pain.

To take the Fire out of a Burn or Scald.

TAKE a lump of lime as big as an egg, and dissolve it in a pint of spring water. When it settles, take the clear water, and beat it up with oil: It will become a thick ointment. With a feather anoint the place, once in 3 or 4 minutes.

A new and expeditious Method of salting Meat.

WHILE the Butcher is killing your beasts, heat a quantity of salt, in a dry pot or other vessel, as hot as fire will make it. Whenever the meat is dressed, cut it up; and, before it grows cold, roll it well in the heated salt. As the pores of the flesh (while warm) are open, the hot salt will effectually penetrate the largest gammons of bacon, or rounds of beef, in 15 or 20 minutes. You may then hang it up to smoke, and it will be perfectly cured; and better flavored, than by the common method of salting. Proved.

Directions for brewing the Essence of Spruce into Beer.

FOR a vessel of 30 gallons, take 12 ounces of Essence, and 2 gallons of molasses; mixing them well in 5 or 6 gallons of warm or cold water, according to the climate. After the liquor has been stirred till it bears a froth, pour it into the cask, and fill it up with water. To make it ferment, add, for the first time, a pint of good yeast, or grounds of beer (afterwards, the grounds of the same cask will serve for the next brewing): Shake the cask well, and set it by for two days, bung open, to work. Then bung it up, and in a few days it will be fit to bottle. The bottles should be well corked, and set, for 8 or 10 days, in a cool cellar; when it will have a finer flavor than any Spruce Beer made in the common way from the fresh branches. The Essence will keep in all climates, for years, if kept from the air.
